I remember when the world was wider than a computer screen, when going outside to play was an exploration, when neighborhoods were as vast as continents and open fields the size of the Sahara. The sky was a limitless ocean with white cloud sailing ships during the day and countless iridescent fish swimming by night. Trees were castle towers, backyards were jungles, sidewalks the Silk Road winding its way toward exotic lands.

Now we see the world through a window, but not so long ago it was a universe of imagination, a dream unending, just outside the front door, waiting to be discovered.
